This was a very successful polar voyage. Parry had a relatively ice free year and penetrated further into the Canadian Arctic than any previous expedition. This was also the first expedition to intentionally winter in the Arctic. A major book in the history of Arctic exploration.
The year 1819 proved to be exceptionally ice free and Parry was able to penetrate through Lancaster Sound and Barrow Strait to Melville Island, into the heart of the Arctic, much further than had been reached previously. The ships successfully wintered on the south coast of Melville Island, the first to intentionally do so, and returned in 1820. In one season he had penetrated halfway to Bering Strait and had charted over a thousand miles of unknown coast. In doing so he demonstrated that an Arctic winter could be endured in safety if not comfort, and set the pattern for Arctic expeditions for a generation to come. Parry made two further attempts at the North-West Passage. In 1827 he tried to reach the North Pole and set a new northern record which stood until 1876.
18. PARRY, William Edward

London. John Murray. 1824. 4to. 27 cm, The First Edition, [5],xxx,571p. errata, complete with 39 engraved maps & plates, good clean clear strikes, (some slight transfer but no foxing on the plates), (inc. 8 folding maps and landfalls), bound in full contemporary tan calf, morocco labels, gilt ruled boards, gilt ruled edges, expertly restored, marbled boards, endpapers and edges, some slight wear at the edges, some moderate foxing and transfer on the plates and maps as usual else a clean fine copy 1,750.00

Throughout the whole of this work, the characteristics of the Eskimaux, and incidents of intercourse with them, absorb the attention of the writer. The work is a treatise on aboriginal life rather than a narrative of scientific discoveries. Twenty-two of the plates, from drawings by Captain Lyon, depict the Eskimaux, in costume, at work and play, hunting and fishing, singly and in family or social groups, children `at play'; and are among the most fascinating and charming of their kind.

Canada's worst bridge disaster. Begun in 1900, it was nearing completion when on Aug. 7th, 1907 it fell 46 m into the St. Lawrence killing 75 men, most of whom were Caughnawaga Indians. The accident was attributed to faulty engineering design. Although a new middle section also fell while being installed in September 1916, the bridge was finally completed in 1917. All Canadian engineering graduate rings are from the steel on this bridge. The bridge design was copied from the Forth Railway Bridge near Edinburgh Scotland, however the design was altered by using 50% less steel.

Nine years spent among the Blood Indians of the Canadian North-West, studying their language, customs, mythology and traditions have given me opportunities of learning much that may prove interesting to young and old. ...After three years residence among the Indians, I was requested to send information on the North-West tribes to the British Association, the Smithsonian Institution and other learned societies. I then began earnestly to collect a good library of books on the Indians, and to study with enthusiasm among the lodges everything pertaining to the life and labor of the Red Men of the West. I soon found that many of the books written were of a sensational character... and at once determined to try to write something that would be reliable... the strange life of the dwellers in the lodges, the wonderful mythology and traditions, and the peculiar customs which are essentially their own to reveal to us a civilization that is fascinating...
